

Paired Peers

A Day in the Life...

Morning

My day begins traditionally with me resenting how long I have managed to stay asleep. I have an incredible ability to sleep, oversleep and then sleep some more. Today I awoke at 10am, 4 hours later than planned! My predominant waking thought was the realisation of how much work I still had to do for this afternoon. Thank goodness for late starting [SUBJECT] lectures. I managed to cram in three and a half hours of work, finishing the questions and compulsory reading for my tutorial. Normally I refuse leaving work for tutorials to the last minute but the combination of extra-curriculum commitments and an incredible ability to procrastinate unfortunately combined to this effect today.

Lunchtime & Afternoon

Lunch was overtaken by work, I had a sandwich later on in the day, in between my lecture and tutorial. Normally a Sainsbury's sandwich and crisps suffices in the perpetually packed common room. I met up with a few friends and after lectures made the quick dash back to [DEPARTMENT] to go to my tutorial. Tutorials are most definitely my favourite part of the 'University experience'. The chance to debate your ideas and ask pertinent questions beats the sometimes dull textbook reading which necessarily predates any tutorial. After what was a particularly productive tutorial I [uncharacteristically] avoided the library in favour of some grocery shopping at Sainsburys.

Afternoon & Evening

I got home and after unpacking the shopping began some work for later in the week. I then re-drafted my CV in the evening and did some career research. I met up with my flat mates for a chat and what now is a traditional tea or coffee at 10. After some arduous philosophical and more light hearted comments I retired to the relative mess that is my room. I listened to a lecture I had missed, watched some recorded TV, played some music, checked the calendar for tomorrow and then fell asleep at around 1am.